Here you can see that I have similar results as you. (The mondern day version of the Windows loader) More info: The wim files seem to have at least the setup-free watermark. These files have a file size of 1.64 MB but their size has been increased from 1.05 MB on the older versions. A: I have generated the original WIM for Windows 10 (build 10586) using Win32DiskImager and it is exactly 1.0 MB. It seems you are using something else, most likely an older version of Win32DiskImager. WIM files are meant to be portable images that can be used to reinstall Windows. They are self-contained and do not include the operating system and all the other files. To generate your own WIM, you can use a tool like Win32DiskImager, which is included on Windows 10 (since build 10240). This tool should be installed on your computer prior to attempting to generate a WIM. The resulting image file is referred to as the "fixed" WIM, as it is not affected by the operating system. If you want to generate a bootable Windows CD, your best bet is to use BitLocker, which is included on Windows 10. All this means is that the build number will be different. It does not matter if your "version" is different. You can generate a valid WIM file with version number 10586 regardless of what is installed on your machine. This page has more information.
