This study was designed to investigate the relationship between natural fluoride exposure and dental fluorosis. A total of 843 young Chinese schoolchildren living in a village where the level of fluoride in the water was 2.0 mg/L were selected as subjects. Fluoride intake was measured using a food frequency questionnaire. Fluoride intake ranged from 1.0 to 20.0 mg/day. Levels of fluoride in the drinking water of the subjects ranged from 0.2 to 9.1 mg/L. Fluorosis was diagnosed using the Dean's index and scores ranged from 1 to 5. Fluorosis was found in 90.4% of the subjects. Subjects who had higher levels of fluoride intake were more likely to have greater degrees of dental fluorosis than subjects who had low levels of fluoride intake. The prevalence of dental fluorosis increased with increasing levels of fluoride intake. The prevalence of dental fluorosis was 84.5% in subjects with higher levels of fluoride intake and 78.1% in subjects with lower levels of fluoride intake. The prevalence of dental fluorosis was significantly correlated with fluoride intake (P of terms, I can't imagine what she was smoking when she was working on the drafts of this article. Most notable about her article, though, is the example she uses of hetero-sexually transmitted trichomoniasis. She uses the case of a married woman who had sex with her boyfriend and contracted the disease. She then goes on to provide a link to a research article that explains why this is hetero-sexually transmitted. She then reports that this is the first time a case of hetero-sexually transmitted trichomoniasis has been reported in Canada. She goes on to suggest that the woman sought treatment for other 2d92ce491b
