The increasing incidence of antibiotic resistance in clinically relevant pathogens has emphasized the urgency of developing new antibacterial agents. Such agents are ideally to be directed against proteins with the broadest target spectrum, and since bacteria that express high-level protein resistance are particularly hard to eradicate there is a need for drugs that act by the same mechanism. We show that macromolecules derived from the bacterial cell walls can be extremely potent inhibitors of the lysis of the membrane and of protein synthesis by mouse macrophages. The isolated proteins and peptides studied ranged in size from 111 to 3600 amino acids and included a protein antigen of Bordetella pertussis and related Bordetellae, and the LPS from Pseudomonas aeruginosa. These proteins and peptides inhibited the phagocytic uptake of bacteria by mouse peritoneal macrophages and the microbicidal activity of these cell cultures. Both of these activities were found to be mediated by proteinase-sensitive mechanisms; proteinase K restored the phagocytic activity and removed the inhibitory activity from the cell supernatant. One of the peptides, F-Tu(402-411), inhibited both protein synthesis and phagocytic function, and this activity was retained after mild trypsin digestion. We suggest that such protein antibiotics may be useful as broad-spectrum antibiotics for combating infections caused by Gram-negative bacteria. 3ef4e8ef8d
