Molecular systematics was used to delimit the species boundaries of the large complex of three crayfish species currently in the genus Triturus. The species involved are T. dussumieri, T. marginatus, and T. kriegi. In all previous studies, criteria involving both morphological and allozyme differences were used. In this study, morphometric and allozyme genetic differences between the species were correlated with their known distributions. We also identified and mapped specimens from all localities sampled in this study. Our results indicate that while intraspecific variation of morphometric variables is relatively low, genetic variation is high among T. dussumieri, T. marginatus, and T. kriegi. These data indicate that geographically distinct forms should be considered for the status of T. dussumieri, T. marginatus, and T. kriegi. Therefore, we recognize the following species: T. dussumieri, T. marginatus, T. kriegi, and T. dobinskii. Genetic clustering analyses based on allozyme loci indicate that the approximately 450 km separation of T. dussumieri and T. marginatus represents a disjunct biogeographic event. We provide evidence that the distribution of T. kriegi has probably been within the distribution of T. dussumieri and T. marginatus historically, and that these lineages have recently diverged.
