The effective propagation of electromagnetic waves through a conductive medium, such as air, is limited by the electrical resistivity of the air. This results in a phenomenon called the skin effect. The skin effect is especially pronounced at low frequency. Specifically, the low frequency energy is most effectively transmitted through the air at the outside surface of the air in the form of deep penetrating radials. However, due to the skin effect, the low frequency energy is not well suited for use at the inside surface of the air. The extreme skin effect results in the inside surface of the air being nearly completely unaffected by the low frequency energy. For example, the frequency ranges of interest in portable telephone communication fall in the range from around 900 MHz to around 1900 MHz. At low frequencies, the antenna must be placed in the center of the portable telephone in order to properly transmit and receive the low frequency energy. Since the outside surface of ba244e880a
