A key way to ensure a team's progress is to give them feedback. Whether they are discussing design and documentation with a client or speaking to a technical sales person, give them an opportunity to feedback on their work. This, of course, can often be time-consuming, but it's worth doing for the long-term benefit. Comfortable with change. One of the most important aspects of a startup's success is being able to absorb change. This goes hand in hand with the previous point, as knowing when to make changes is key to a smooth and successful transition. There's nothing that will put a startup's development into overdrive more than a late change request. Learning to work within the changing environment is a trait that every engineer should have. Being able to draw on your own experience and feedback. As engineers, it's good to have an idea of what we are working on, even if it's just a high-level overview. From there we can better understand the best methods to approach a problem, as well as what products we would like to use and how they can be integrated with what we're doing. This can be achieved by talking to other engineers and contributing to open source projects. One benefit of this is that you learn that software development is a team sport, and you may even find someone you have worked with before. Being a good listener. It's tempting to become a gatekeeper, to make sure your own experience is always the one the other engineers follow. It's important to remember that the startup you are working for will benefit from having you input, but it also benefits from other people's
