You may have to adjust some parameters in case your client uses different version/settings of the driver, and in the case of dynamic allocation, your client may be returning different numbers of connections. You should also note that in order to maintain backward compatibility with older OS, the driver preallocates only the first two sockets for each client. The next step is to create the socket objects. The driver allocates the following number of pointers of class __u32 for each socket: 1 for the address family part of the structure, 1 for the type of socket, and 1 for the protocol part of the structure That means that for each socket object, the driver allocates: 3 __u32s for the address family part.
