The ultrastructure of the microglia in the superior colliculus of the frog, Rana esculenta. The microglia, the surveying cells of the central nervous system, were studied in the supercular colliculus of the frog Rana esculenta. The microglia are situated in the superficial parenchyma and can be classified as active phagocytic cells (containing cytoplasmic vesicles and intracytoplasmic, membrane-bound phagosomes) or inactive cells (absence of all cytoplasmic organelles). The microglia are found throughout the superior colliculus, but are mostly distributed in the superficial parenchyma. The cytoplasm of the microglia is characterized by a large number of vacuoles containing products of disintegration and degeneration of neurons and neuropil elements. The presence of a relatively low number of myelin fibers in the parenchyma indicates a state of degeneration of the oligodendrocytes. The microglia are characterized by a small, dark, ovoid nucleus, which is located in the center of the cytoplasm. The nuclei of the microglia show a low level of chromatin. The cytoplasm is filled with a large number of mitochondria, smooth endoplasmic reticula, phagosomes, and lysosomes containing phagocytosed material. The microglia are also characterized by a high concentration of free ribosomes and polysomes. The basement membrane is not continuous and shows a discontinuous pattern in its distribution, possibly indicating a role in the migration and circulation of the microglia within the colliculus.
