MEGA GOAL 1 : %Tags Related Posts Share This Slamming the Pandora's Box in the United States of America. Whilst the Fair Work Commission has begun its review of the award system in the construction industry, the first victims will be migrant workers – construction workers from around the world who are employed under substandard conditions and without the protections that a regular worker's award would provide. This is a Pandora's box that the government has opened in an attempt to lower the cost of government. The sad and unfortunate result is that some of the worst employers will get a work force that is at best poorly paid, at worst unprotected. It is my firm opinion that the government does not understand what it has created. There will inevitably be breaches of the award system, even though they impose the greatest obligation on employers. The idea that the penalties imposed for breaches of the award system would be greater than the obligations under the award system is frightening to say the least. Indeed it will be a free for all because the government will be complicit in the employment of workers who have been badly treated. As the government is reviewing the award system in the construction industry I would like to explain why a system of awards that focuses on the well-being of the worker does not work. It is time to look at the international evidence. The United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and New Zealand have all developed award systems that are based on the principle that the employees should have the same entitlement as other employees in their industry. In New Zealand, in the construction sector, this has been made explicit and the government has provided penalties for breaches of the awards system. They have also provided a framework for the employer to self-regulate. In the United Kingdom, the government has also provided employers ba244e880a
