I am David Lee, owner of David Pics as well as this website. In communication systems, noise or interference is a problem that may reduce the quality of a signal being communicated. For example, the noise in a cellular phone call is often much more noticeable than the noise in a wired phone call. In some cases, this noise can distort the signals being transmitted, which causes a degradation in the quality of the call. In a wireless cellular phone, for example, signals being transmitted from a base station can be contaminated by other signals or noise that is received by a mobile terminal. The noise that is picked up or leaked into the transmission path can lead to reduced quality, and thus, the quality of a wireless cellular phone call can be substantially reduced. Some communication systems are designed to compensate for the noise by using some form of error detection or error correction mechanisms. These mechanisms are often applied to data that is being transmitted. When the data contains error, the error detection mechanisms can be used to identify the error and correct it in the data. These mechanisms are usually not applied when the data is not being sent, but instead, is simply being stored. When the data is being sent, the error detection or correction mechanisms can be used to help determine if the data being sent is being transmitted correctly. In many communication systems, data is communicated by being sent over a communication channel that includes a finite capacity. A communication system that uses a finite communication channel as a medium for communication has a maximum amount of data that can be successfully sent through the
