The process takes a few minutes, while it's not recommended to interrupt it. After the recovery is finished you can see it has extracted the content. Q: What's the difference between and ? I'm trying to understand what the key attribute and the feature attribute does for the roboform and assert_list validation tags. What's the difference between this validation: and this one? Wouldn't both of them apply the same validation? A: The key is the key attribute in the markup. This is how RoR uses it to know what element/s to validate. When it is not specified, it defaults to type, name, data-* attributes. The feature attribute is a HTML5 way to add extra attributes to HTML, that specify what the browser should use as validity constraints. For email fields this would be the pattern attribute. So, using your example, While it could still be easily done by checking the email and send it to a server to be validated, this method of validation is simpler. The pattern is a regular expression, as you can see in the Mozilla Reference (click the picture) Publicly declared Party of the people and for the people; Founder of the Democratic Party in America. Few can claim to have played such a pivotal role in history as the man whose life is portrayed here. Born Robert F. Kennedy, Jr., this book traces his early life from his childhood, his education and his career as a United States Senator. It focuses on his life in politics and his personal relationships, both on and off the floor of the United States Senate. Along the way,
