parts." Carving a replica of a 10-million-year-old lemur finger by an unknown person. Photo: National Geographic The replica of the lemur finger was spotted on the floor of the exhibit, under a bench. "This is one of the world's oldest sculptures," the post read.

"I'd give the lemur finger a 4.5 out of 5 stars." Some people in the Facebook group were not particularly impressed by the find. "I doubt that's a real lemur," one user posted. "How old is it?" Others pointed out that the gesture looked more like a human fingerprint. "I'm sorry but that's not a lemur finger. It's a human fingerprint," one said.

Some of the comments suggested that the "fingers" were a prank. "This is a fingerprint. I think the 'fingers' are a joke, then. But this is truly amazing." The lemur finger replica is part of the museum's latest exhibit called "Serengeti Before Man." The exhibit shows how animals, plants and insects lived on Earth when hominids (early man) and Homo sapiens (modern man) were still evolving. "Most of what we know about the past comes from preserved fossilized remains and trace fossils left behind by animals, plants and insects," said National Geographic. "There are fossils in our planet's rocks that tell the story of life long before Homo sapiens arrived on the scene," read a National Geographic blog post. "These clues are invaluable." The fossilized lemur finger could help shed light on the past life of lemurs. Fossils of these primates from the Serengeti region are around 10 million years old. "A lemur was an early member of the primate order, living about as far back as the dinosaurs and placing it on the evolutionary tree right alongside Homo," the National Geographic website read. "Although many lemur species are still alive today, such as ring-tailed lemurs, sported on Madagascar, the lemurs' most famous species, the dwarf lemur, are all extinct." O
