Since the most recent United Nations World Population projections of 2050 (UN/US Census Bureau, 2013), significant demographic changes are expected as a result of population flows across national borders. International migration is also associated with mortality risks and health effects in the host countries. However, the impact of international migration on population aging, and corresponding health care needs in host countries, remains poorly understood. The purpose of this study is to analyze the impact of international migration on population aging in developed nations and the role of host countries in meeting future needs of older persons living in the source country. This study focuses on elderly migrants and their children in the context of five well-developed countries: Canada, the United Kingdom, France, Germany, and Japan. To explore and compare the contribution of international migration in terms of population aging in these countries, we developed a new approach of pro-demographic modeling that aims to incorporate the dynamics of international migration flows. In this framework, the migration flows are modeled as a series of transitions between the source and destination countries. We modeled a number of key demographic events, such as the fraction of a national population aged  $\geq 65$ , mortality of the elderly, and the fraction of elderly persons in a country as a function of time. The model indicates that the future population
