Culture Another feature is a bit like a game's story mode, with four main scenarios: a school examination, a buffet, a girl's summer vacation, and an office work session. Each scenario provides to the player some points. The player may perform actions in each scenario. For example, by answering the questions, a student may receive bonus points. A player may complete the scenario without losing points. If the student scores a higher than the required number of points, he/she will advance to the next scenario. As the player completes the scenarios, the game will continue to give him/her points. When the player reaches the last scenario, he/she will acquire a smiley face icon, and will receive a 5,000-yen gift. AG3 generates an AI opponent (AI Calc), and allows for either turn-based or real time (AI Motion) play. As with many of Ayahashi's projects, there is a card as well as a game board. The card is for the player, and the game board is for the opponent. History Artificial Girl 3 was released in November 2005 by Hiroko Ayahashi. For the most part, it was built on her previous title, Nihon no Kiseki (lit. The story of Japan). According to Hackernoon, her original goal was to "understand the mechanism of learning through reward." Artificial Girl 3 was created to provide a model of learning to let children emulate the process. In an effort to achieve this, the game included learning mechanics for performing science experiments and refining learning skills. Critical reception IT Media Asia's ADB magazine gave Artificial Girl 3 a 9.0 rating (the rating was so high that it did not even have a score), with the 9.0 rating sign 3da54e8ca3
