A California utility will sign a major deal with a major European player on Sunday, adding the state to a growing list of markets where the German firm will procure energy via long-term contracts. The agreement with Swisscom, the parent company of U.S. telecom equipment maker Swisscom AG, will allow Pacific Gas & Electric Co. to use Swisscom's renewable energy sources to supply about 18,000 homes over the next 20 years. The program will provide California with the first-ever participation by a major European supplier in its cap-and-trade program. Utilities from Germany, Italy and Denmark have signed up so far. Roughly 1.8 million people in California are dependent on PG&E, which filed for bankruptcy in January after a botched upgrade of its gas-fired power plants caused a series of wildfires that destroyed the town of Paradise. Pacific Gas is also the target of a federal investigation for allegedly overcharging customers in 2017 and 2018, allegations that Swisscom said last week could lead to fines. California has been one of the more aggressive markets for long-term contracts, committing to reducing greenhouse-gas emissions in ways to which other states aren't required. The state's cap-and-trade program is credited with helping California cut carbon emissions by about 12 percent below its 2005 level, a record low in the nation. Over 100 companies have paid more than $200 billion to abide by the cap-and-trade system, which requires major emitters, including power companies and major manufacturers, to buy permits. The green power will be produced by a 1.8-megawatt solar project in the Mojave desert owned by Q-Cells AG, a German energy company. It will be the first time the project is used to supply power from renewable sources to a major utility. The deal was announced by Nevada Gov. Brian Sandoval in February, who also attended the signing event at the Swisscom headquarters on Sunday in Bern. "I don't know about the future, but there are no other countries in the world where you can do this," Sandoval said. "And you can be confident if you look at the underlying technology of the project." The project could become the largest solar project in the world, reaching 2 gigawatts, Sandoval said. "It will be the largest solar installation in the world, and it is
