Each program stored in a computer may be assigned a unique name known as a. The variable P represents the program, and each change in variable P represents a change in the state of the program. The 3-dimensional case is similar, except that the focus is changed to the analyst's actual assessment of the analytic process, with the analyst's status and role as an intersubjective object of reflection at the center. In contrast to the traditional view of the subject as both a static object of study and a reflective one, the relational view acknowledges the dynamic and unstable nature of these human activities. The focus of the current research was to examine the interaction between the philosophical ideas and practices that dominate modern European thought in book form. This case study focuses on the philosophical and theological positions of the "German Enlightenment." The central theme addressed by the case study is the tension in early eighteenth-century Germany between the metaphysical system and the empirical world of experience. The case focuses on Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz's attempt to unite a mechanistic world view

The metatheoretical account of intersubjectivity is linked to the historical process of change, particularly with respect to the development of the material and spatial context in which human life is lived and worked out. In this context, the concept of "modernity" is understood as a particular form of life in the global market, creating and maintaining social systems of domination that are based on the methods of rational-instrumental reason. We are no longer simply creatures seeking to understand the world in the light of an innate being or the mind, but more complex beings whose lives are embedded in the practices and material world of our times.
