According to a recent analysis by Coindesk, Bitcoin is the fifth most valuable cryptocurrency, with a market cap of US$75 billion and US$45.5 billion dollars in circulation. Cash instruments, such as Bitcoin, have experienced a surge in value as more people are recognizing the future impact this digital currency can have on the financial sector, and the potential for everyday use. A breakdown of Bitcoin's value over time is shown below: As interest in Bitcoin surges, other cryptocurrencies have been introduced to capitalize on this increased demand. One of the most prominent of these new cryptocurrencies is Ethereum, a platform that allows users to build decentralized applications, and the first blockchain to allow users to store their personal information and assets. One of the most intriguing aspects of Ethereum is that it allows users to create custom currencies, utilizing the Bitcoin blockchain as a base. This brings to mind the infamous experiments conducted by the Federal Reserve. In a study reported by Inflation Targeting, the Federal Reserve experimented with creating a series of coins and notes of varying denominations, and varying levels of gold and silver content. This new tool of monetary policy is called "base money," which some economists argue can be considered a more effective way of controlling inflation. Ethereum is less complicated than Bitcoin, with a transaction time of about 2.5 minutes and a transaction fee of about US$0.10. Most Bitcoin miners are not interested in Ethereum, due to the higher transaction fees. However, the purpose of the new currency is to surpass Bitcoin in value, and the introduction of a completely new currency could soon lead to Ethereum surpassing Bitcoin as the most valuable cryptocurrency. With the emergence of Ethereum
