Convert Paths to Outlines When using the Pen tool, you can convert the stroke into a shape by selecting Layer/Path/Convert to Outline. This lets you apply the same outline to different layers. Create New Layers by Using the Magic Wand If you want to create a whole new layer, the simplest way to do so is to use the Magic Wand tool. This will select all the pixels that match the specified color. If you're working in an RGB color mode (You can change the color mode by using the Colors/Adjustments panel. I'll explain how to do this in the next section.) just make sure you're in a white-to-black mode (Convert to 8-bit). Just find the area you want to select in the image and click or drag over it. Or go to Layer/New/Elliptical Marquee and click/drag over the area you want. The boundary of the selection is indicated by a thick white line. This does not affect the selection - it just helps to see the edges of the selection and guide you on where to click/drag. If you want to select an area that isn't already selected, use the Polygonal or Freeform Lasso tools. These tools use different patterns of pixels to create a selection that you can click to select a whole new area. How to change color mode in Photoshop The Colors/Adjustments panel is found on the right side of the screen. This panel has many sub-features, but most of the time the important thing to change is the color mode. Roughly speaking, the color mode is the number of colors (bits) that each pixel in an image is made up of. In a pixel made up of 6 bits of color, that's  $2^6 = 64$ , which is also sometimes written as  $2^8 =$

256. This means you can have 255 (224) different colors available to you in your images. This is not usually enough - an image will usually need at least 10,000 different colors. (However, you can greatly increase the number of colors by using different color palettes and different color effects, which I'll explain in the next section of this lesson.) You can also tell the color mode by the color swatches on the left side of the panel. These represent the 24 possible colors in RGB mode.
