Sodium and potassium uptake by the heavy metal-tolerant alga Skeletonema costatum (Dinophyceae) in the presence of Cadmium and Zinc. Skeletonema costatum (Dinophyceae) is a microalga used as a biopesticide for the control of harmful algae in eutrophic waters. Little is known about its tolerance mechanisms to heavy metals. In this study, the uptake of sodium and potassium by this microalga was investigated in the presence of CdCl(2) and ZnCl(2). The study of Na(+), K(+), Cd(2+) and Zn(2+) uptake was performed by using single-species and two-species bioassays in batch systems. The results obtained demonstrated that in single-species bioassays, Skeletonema costatum accumulated Cd(2+) and Zn(2+) at high levels in the presence of both metal ions, but had low affinity for sodium and potassium. In contrast, in two-species bioassays, the presence of Zn(2+) caused a significant reduction in the uptake of Cd(2+) by Skeletonema costatum, while having no effect on the accumulation of Zn(2+) by Skeletonema costatum.

Nevertheless, the presence of Cd(2+) induced a greater inhibition of the uptake of both sodium and potassium by Skeletonema costatum. In the presence of Cd(2+) the uptake of Na(+) and K(+) decreased by 40% and 32%, respectively, while when Zn(2+) was present, the uptake of both ions decreased by 45% and 50%, respectively, as compared to the controls.
