This is not 1984, looking through the book and one of the points that Anson Rabinbach makes is the relationship between order and work has been driven by changing technology. In the machine world, Rabinbach tells us, the order and power over the work is defined by the assembly of parts and a worker. One of the main points that Anson Rabinbach makes about the human motor is that it was not designed to be efficient but to lead the economy and it was not full of them. In fact, this book is a book that argues that our current mode of production is broken. It does not follow the needs of the population. However, the book also argues that the human motor is not a done. It was a machine. It is not something that is just part of a system or a tool that is connected from the whole of our economic activity. The human motor is what makes us human. It is our purpose, our different ourselves as human through the activity of the human motor. The key.
