IELTS.Dogs Want to Know Why We Show Them: A Study in Pet Preferences Wednesday, February 13, 2017 The Science Behind Why We Show Dogs What They Want to Know For centuries, man and dog have been companions. Now scientists are taking a closer look into what the researchers are discovering by observing humans' interactions with dogs. These discoveries may help us to improve our relationships with our four-legged friends. The "why we show dogs what they want to know" study was conducted by researchers from the Department of Psychology and the Charles Darwin Foundation. "We show dogs to elicit a behaviour we want from them, or to get a certain response," said Anne Husband, a psychologist. "In some cases we get aggressive responses and we don't want that. In other cases we want a dog to come to us." "The research is about understanding the origins and development of our relationships with our pets," said Husband. "Many people are interested in how we, as humans, came to become so attached to our pets, and maybe more importantly what that attachment does for us. How do we come to think our pets are more important to us than anything else in our lives? We think that our attitude towards them develops from the way we treat them." As far as dogs are concerned, the study revealed they react differently to humans depending on what a researcher tells them. "Some dogs are just naturally more interested in the human form, and respond to the human presence," said Husband. "Other dogs love to be with us and don't really want to do anything until we have something to give them, then they will approach us and try to get it." When researchers asked dogs for 3e33713323
