The Elements can be used to create rudimentary images, but it only has the most rudimentary editing features. There are no layers, no easy-to-manipulate image styles, and no as vast a selection of tools as Photoshop. Regardless of which program you use, getting the most out of the editing program requires you to master a host of techniques. This chapter provides an overview of how you can most effectively manipulate images in a variety of ways. # The Image Before you can learn Photoshop, you need to understand a few things about images and the way they function. Images are made up of _raster_ data, which is like a recipe—it's in a numeric format. Some numbers are more significant than others, though. Think of them as a series of numbers with varying importance. For example, a raster image containing only red, blue, and yellow is a three-color image, but in reality, it consists of thousands of color pixels (called _dots_) in a grid (see Figure 13-1). Figure 13-1 Or two differently colored pixels. The image is made of tiny dots that can combine to form colors. This is what makes it a raster image (that's a big computer term for "a picture"). The number of pixels in a given area of an image varies, but most images are between 3,000 and 5,000 pixels wide and between 3,000 and 5,000 pixels high. The first thing to know about images is that they are, generally speaking, rectangular-shaped boxes that can include more than one image file. You can make a new file by dragging a selection window containing objects to the folder window. You can drag and drop images from the file window directly onto the thumbnail in the folder window, so the image is automatically included in the new file. If you don't want a new file to contain multiple images, you can group the objects by using the Group command, as shown in Figure 13-2. However, this can be awkward if you're trying to move the entire file. Figure 13-2 Grouping objects. The directory tree, or folder hierarchy, is a list of all images and folders. You can highlight any object to select it and view its location in the directory tree. The folder with the lowest-level directory information and the most recent file is the one that contains the current image. To select a

1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to spas and, more particularly, to a structure for mounting a water delivery system to the rim of a spa. 2. Description of the Related Art Spas are increasingly popular for both personal and business use. An individual having a spa in his or her home may save a considerable amount of money on utility bills over the cost of running a central unit in the home. Similarly, a business owner may reduce office overhead by running a spa in his or her office. Spas generally include a spa shell, a pump, a power source, and one or more jets. The spa shell has a cylindrical opening on one end that is sealed with a door. The spa shell is supported on a subjacent floor in an area where water can be provided. The pump is located below the spa shell and is coupled thereto by a shaft. The pump is powered by the power source (e.g., an electrical power cord), and, in turn, the pump provides a continuous supply of water to the spa. The jets are generally mounted on a top portion of the spa and are operated by a control circuit. One problem with spas of the type described above is that in many instances it is desirable to attach other components to the spa to increase the features or operational characteristics thereof. For example, some spa owners desire to mount controls such as a timer, a spa light, a spa fountain, and the like, directly to the top of the spa shell. Unfortunately, the spa shells are generally provided with a tub-like top portion having a generally circular perimeter. Accordingly, if conventional means were used to attach components to the top of the spa shell, it would be difficult to position the components in a desired location without interfering with the perimeter of the top portion of the shell. Another problem with spas of the type described above is that, during use, it is desirable to periodically loosen and remove the spa cover to permit insertion of the pump into the spa to replenish the water supply therein. With spas of the type described above, there exists a problem in that it is difficult to lift the spa cover from the spa shell so as to permit the insertion of the pump. Typically, spa covers may be as much as one or two feet off of the top of the spa shell. Accordingly, the spa cover must either be lifted to permit insertion of the pump therethrough or, alternatively, the spa must be partially dismantled to permit the insertion of the pump

Maine Shows Love For Mamas Well, I'm a sucka for mamas and a hater for nannies. I think both are very important. I love having my son around as my beloved confidant and for the time being, I'm responsible for him while his mom is away at work. Sometimes my son needs to be around someone other than me. So in these situations, I use a nanny. Do you use a nanny? What works for you? If you would like to share some ideas, feel free to let me know! How do I get the row with id = "1" and id = "4"? I want to try to match ID with values in Stock_locations1 and stock_locations2. ID Stock_locations1 Stock_locations2 1 1 3 2 2 5 3 3 7 4 4 1 A: As I already hinted by the names of the columns, you should use merge or outer. You can try the following way: outer(df1[c('Stock_locations1', 'Stock_locations2')], df2[c('Stock_locations1', 'Stock_locations2')], ">") # ID Stock_locations1 Stock_locations2 # 1
