Automatically change an item's attributes Recurse directories: allow you to apply the same attributes to all the elements in a directoryQ: NodeJS Express with Elasticsearch in Docker Container I am trying to set up a node.js project that runs a dockerized instance of elasticsearch on a docker server. I know I need a nodejs server that can be run inside the container, but I can not figure out how to make a path to the elasticsearch configuration files or where to put them when deploying it to a server. Do I need to create a separate ElasticSearch configuration file and package it inside the server? Should my dockerized elasticsearch directory be placed inside the project root? I don't want the base path for the search index to be the dockerized instance's container path because I will need this to be outside the container for deployment. How can I set the base path to not be this? A: elasticsearch can be installed into your docker server as a service in 2 ways. Through dockerizing elasticsearch in order to make it a docker service Installing elasticsearch into your docker server For your specific case, why don't you install elasticsearch into your docker server and run this container with a different user than the actual elasticsearch user. This will make sure that elasticsearch gets fully installed and is completely isolated from the user running the service. I hope this helps Q: Button to show and hide a div I have a button. When the user clicks the button I want to show a div. When the button is clicked again, I want the div to hide, and when the user clicks the button again, the div should reappear. I have the div hidden with the 'display: none' in CSS. When I click the button to show the div, the div is now visible, but it is not hidden again when the button is clicked again. I will be grateful for any tips! $('.update').click(function(){ $('.update-popup').toggleClass('active'); }); .update{ border: none; padding: 6px; border-radius: 20px; background-color: #928a99; color: #fff; margin-bottom
