A team of biologists who study the threat of micro-plastic pollution to the Great Barrier Reef in Australia has revealed the startling condition of the oceanic ecosystem. Researchers led by Dr Steve Murrell, from the University of Queensland, examined 64 individual coral reefs across the north-eastern Australian reef, finding that 79% of them showed damaging levels of plastic particles. The research, published in PLOS ONE, also found that the average density of micro-plastic particulate in the water column was 5,400 particles per km². "These results show us just how bad the Great Barrier Reef's health is at the moment," Dr Murrell said. "Plastic pollution is a critical threat to the Great Barrier Reef and a significant problem globally." Plastic pollution is a global problem, and some regions of the world are far worse offenders than others. Professor Chris Wilcox, who heads the CSIRO's Coral Reef Ecosystems And Aquaculture research unit, told The New Daily in 2016 that coastal areas were the worst offenders. "The problem is worse in coastal areas because there is a lot of floating plastics and all sorts of rubbish is floating up onshore," Professor Wilcox said. "The Great Barrier Reef is too important to be damaged by plastics, as it provides protection against the most destructive hurricanes, cyclones and storm surges." "This study confirms what others have found that the Great Barrier Reef is under threat from plastics, and highlights the urgent need for urgent reduction action," said Rachel Warren from the Australian Marine Conservation Society. According to the United Nations, waste plastic production grows at an annual rate of 9.2%, making it one of the fastest growing pollution problems on the planet. After a delay, the Minneapolis City Council approved a "traditional" light rail on Oct. 30, 2015 to provide efficient transit to the airport, the downtown and the University of Minnesota. Light rail to the airport was approved in 2010 but the light rail to downtown and the university will cost about $1 billion.
