Despite experimental evidence in support of the "mate choice" hypothesis for women's sexual selection, few studies have examined this hypothesis in nonhuman species. This lack of evidence could be due to methodological problems in the assessment of reproductive performance in nonhumans. Here we demonstrate that when given limited resources, males of a lizard species, Heteronotia binooi, consistently display the same patterns of reproductive investment that females do, thus suggesting that male choice has played an important role in the evolution of sexual selection in this species. Females, however, exhibit a different pattern: they display decreased reproductive performance when they mate with males that have lower success rates. Based on these results, we argue that female choice may be a key factor in the evolution of sexual selection in this species. 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a plating method for depositing conductive material on a substrate. The present invention further relates to a non-removal mask used in the plating method. 2. Discussion of the Background A conventional plating method has been employed to deposit conductive material on a substrate. The conductive material (e.g., Ni) is applied on a substrate, and a plating solution (e.g., nickel sulfamate) is then added to the substrate. In the conventional plating method, the conductive material remains on the substrate after the substrate is removed from the solution. As a result, the conductive material does not dissipate as quickly as desired. It is difficult to control the thickness of the conductive material deposited on the substrate. According to a first aspect of the present invention, a plating method is provided. The method includes the step of applying a non-removal mask on a substrate, and the step of soaking the non-removal mask

The floating diffusion region of a CMOS image sensor typically has a capacitance-to-voltage conversion gain ($g-1$) of about 2000. With in-pixel charge to voltage conversion (i.e. also referred to herein as "ganging" or "ganging up") the FD region capacitance can be reduced 3e33713323
