The problem I have is that when I change my code on a certain function in the WCF app, the clients webservice app will not respond. The webservice is not responding to requests. I have no code change in the application as I have just commented out the existing code temporarily. I have modified the code once during which the client had a problem with the WCF and came back a day later. This was resolved by going to the site and running a repair. This seems to have fixed everything. When the repair did not work I tried to delete the app pools and create a new one to see if it would work. This did not work. Is this usually the issue with missing dlls? Please note that I am not in a position to post the source code because it is on a customers site. EDIT: I tried adding the service reference from the web-service client and it could still not connect. I also tried to change the version of the quark SDK and it did not work. I also tried running the app under the debugger and it did not connect. A: At the time of answering the question the problem was not the service though after a repair the webservice was still working but other functionality was not working. The other functionality was working once after I had run a repair. This problem was not caused by missing assemblies. Etoikos Etoikos (Greek: Ethoi Kosmos; English:) is an artistic magazine focused on Greek culture, art, and culture. Its editor is journalist John Markopoulos. Etoikos was established in 1981. In 1991 the magazine changed direction, becoming less of a publication for serious artists, and became more of a 1cb139a0ed
