The legislature's Transportation, Safety, Communications and Technology Committee held a public hearing last week to review the proposed law. If it's voted out unanimously by the full House and Senate, it will go to Gov. Gavin Newsom for final signature. CBS2 has been following the legislation throughout the legislative process. More than five years ago, in 2015, the Senate passed the first version of the bill. It would have required a state-issued driver's license to include the knowledge of the dangers of distracted driving. At the time, the bill faced pushback from the National Motorists Association, which argued that implementing such a law would be a federal issue. But since the law passed in 2015, several other states have introduced distracted driving legislation that would affect California. And lawmakers agree that more needs to be done in this area. "This is a public health issue that affects not just motor vehicle users, but it's an issue that 3da54e8ca3
