This biography of [American writer Truman Capote] will make you read his work again. Its a story of creative brilliance and of unbridled libido. I am the best writer in the world because I have been unable to write without the greatest material. In [New York] I was even doing research in some of the public libraries of the city, and I read mostly detective stories, as do nearly all writers, to put down the flavor of places. For women, setting is everything, and I am virtually helpless in that regard. And a good detective story needs no research, for you know the place so well. Best writer in the world. That was the year [Truman Capote] died. In 1963 an airline stewardess took a look at his nose and said, "I know a fellow who does that." So I had a look at it and realized that I was in trouble. A surgeon, I think, took a look at my nose and said, "I'll give it a try." I had already heard his name, and later I found out that he was also a person who could help me get into short stories. My nose is perfectly straight and my nose-tip's so short, it makes me look exactly like the comical country boy who I am. It was not until [my friend] Roger [Sperling] offered to take me to New York to see him that I really decided to try to get in stories. There was only one previous writer who hadn't tried that, and that was John O'Hara. He had tried it, but he didn't like it very much. In the light of some of his earlier successes, I felt that I didn't have the confidence to try it. I decided that I might as well try it at once. If I failed, I would continue to collect chips for the wall of the house. I had about a year and a half to go, and I went to New York and met

The invention relates to a contact window, a contact window array, and an electro-optic display element having a touch-sensitive screen. Currently, flat-panel displays are the general rule in the domestic market. Flat-panel displays generally have display elements in the form of a multi-pixel matrix. This matrix, however, often limits the functionality and/or expandability of the display. Among other things, it is desirable for displays to be able to detect touch on a surface. A piezoelectric touch sensor is widely used to detect touch on a surface. The use of a piezoelectric touch sensor facilitates the integration of the touch sensor with the display. However, the problem is that the display must be separated from the touch sensor by a mechanically sensitive spacer. The addition of a spacer generally complicates manufacturing processes and reduces the aperture ratio of the display. There is a need, therefore, for a more convenient touch sensor that enables a piezoelectric touch sensor to be integrated with a display and that increases the aperture ratio of the display.
