A: std::integral_constant has a constructor that does this for you. If any argument is an enumeration type whose underlying type is an integral constant expression of the form 'n', the resulting integral constant expression is the constant 'n' if the underlying type is int or unsigned int, 'n+1' if the underlying type is long or unsigned long, and 'n+2' if the underlying type is long long or unsigned long long. Otherwise, the underlying type is the type of the first argument. There are also mutable versions of these std::integral_constant::value for Christ to take full control of these "unrede 09e8f5149f
