Environment and the Timber Wars in the Northern Rockies, 1850-1940. The frontier experience was one that many Native Americans shared with settlers, who were driven out of the west coast states and northern Mexico to escape American Indians during the mid-nineteenth century. By moving to lands that had already been settled by Europeans, settlers left substantial tracts of land in the northern Rocky Mountain West that were still virgin and open to settlement. The rich resources of the region and the vast amounts of untapped timber, in addition to the Native Americans who had lived there for centuries, raised the possibility that Native American communities would be able to continue to live and work the land, even though encroaching settlers faced the prospect of land loss and displacement. This paper examines how Native Americans, on both sides of the Rocky Mountain divide, used the environment and geography to respond to these changes. It argues that while the northern Rockies were not a frontier in the conventional sense, Native Americans were still part of a frontier society in that their lives were shaped by the movement of settlers and the changing circumstances of settlement, and that this context shaped their response to environmental conditions.
