Electromechanical coupling between chemically gated and mechanically active living cells. Mechanical activity can alter the local chemical environment of cells, but the consequences of this interaction are not well understood. Here we show that under conditions where mechanical activity is fast compared to cellular metabolic responses, mechanical stimulation can trigger spatially heterogeneous chemical signaling due to discrete mechanical activity which is itself dependent on cellular metabolic activity. Mechanical stimulation of cells cultured on planar membranes induces a calcium wave that propagates in a diffusible way. Metabolic perturbation of the cells impaired the propagation of the calcium wave. In the absence of any significant extracellular calcium, mechanical stimulation of the cells caused localized extracellular accumulation of adenosine 3',5'-cyclic monophosphate (cAMP
