The script is working great on all except one page. On that page, the product image is not showing so it is not returning any items even though it should be. I have no idea why this is happening. Any suggestions will be appreciated. I will post the cURL script at the bottom of this post. Thanks. A: According to the response from eBay's ecommerce API (the ebayitemsearchresponse-id parameter is supposed to return a value which you need to use to get the actual objects. The call to eBay's API you gave us at the beginning of your post (ebayitemsearchrequest.aspx) is not returned with that parameter by default. Seems like for the single case you're describing you need to modify your API call. Here's an example of how you could do that (FYI you'll need to get the oauth_token from # readers, and you get down-voted, I don't want my first impression of a thread to be that something's wrong with it. What I'm curious about, because I've been saying this for awhile now, is how much we read something before we click it, and this is one of those instances where I suspect there's a reader on HN that would probably click it if it were something as mundane as a tweet. I also suspect, that should be our barometer for these things, because maybe that's something we could change to avoid having the click-bait stuff be the HN top story on the homepage. I mean, if a post can get to the homepage without first passing by a "what's wrong with this?" bar, there's pretty much nothing we can do about it. ------ kcr You can follow him at: ------ cubicle67 seems like he's just throwing shit on the wall. ~~~ 1yeargeuro unfortunately not quite Q: Why does the ArrayList with a Custom Class Object keep repeating itself?
