Adobe Photoshop 2022 (Version 23.0.2) [Win/Mac]

For many years, cervical artery dissection has been the cause of acute, ischemic stroke in women ages 50 and over. This causes significant mortality and disability. Risk factors include the combination of stress and endothelial shear stress, factors that act via the coronary circulation. Age may accentuate the role of risk factors that involve the coronary circulation. Atherosclerosis associated with stenosis, formation of vulnerable plaques, and endothelial shear stress is a common cause of acute atherosclerotic heart disease, a significant contributor to myocardial infarction (MI). Some specific aspects of the coronary endothelium may be injured in the acute phase of unstable coronary atherosclerotic plaque. If it is found that the coronary endothelium is damaged in acute stroke, it may be possible to test the role of coronary vulnerability in this context. We will test the hypothesis that coronary vulnerable plaques are present in the neck in young adults with acute ischemic stroke. This will allow us to identify those at risk of coronary thromboembolism if they have ischemic stroke. In this study, we will compare prospectively the coronary arteries of young adults who present with acute ischemic stroke to two different control groups: asymptomatic, older adults who have shown no evidence of ischemic stroke, and younger adults without evidence of stroke and without chronic risk factors. Coronary vulnerable plaques will be identified by echocardiographic methods. Other measures of arterial vulnerability will be sought for comparison (including sex steroid hormones).
