Conventionally, when the operator of the robot for use in the water, such as a boat crane, is continuously operated, his or her right and left arms are subjected to heavy loads, as the robot is operated in the water, so that his or her arms are weak and his or her body is also weak. Therefore, in order to protect the operator of the robot, it is necessary to take measures for supporting the right and left arms of the operator, thereby to prevent the operator from fatigue. Accordingly, in order to support the right and left arms of the operator of the robot, one-art support for preventing the operator's fatigue is disclosed in, for example, Japanese Utility Model Laid-Open Publication No. 47-7884. According to the art, a supporting means is interposed between the right and left arms of the operator and a robot for supporting the operator, so that the robot can support the right and left arms of the operator. However, according to the prior art, because a load is transmitted from the robot to the operator through the supporting means, the rigidity of the robot is necessarily decreased to a certain extent. As a result, when the robot is operating in the water, the moment of inertia of the robot is increased and, consequently, the rotation speed of the robot is also increased. In addition, because the rigidity of the robot is reduced due to the decrease in the rigidity of the supporting means, a counter force applied to the robot from the supporting means is increased, so that the robot is violently shaken. In this way, the robot is subjected to the shocks and, accordingly, the movement of the robot may be greatly deviated. Furthermore, because the rigidity of the robot is low, the vibration of the robot is increased, so that the oscillation of the robot is increased. In this way
