The Chinese Academy of Sciences has announced it will launch a manned space programme to send a robot to the moon as soon as 2020. The planned manned space program will see a lunar landing robot land on the moon by 2020. Liu Changsheng, a professor at the academy, said there were plenty of experimental steps to go before China could put a human on the moon. He said that China would take some important steps in human space exploration with the launching of the Chang'e-4 moon lander in the fourth quarter of 2016 and the deployment of a spacecraft to the moon carrying three to five astronauts in the second half of the year. "When China launches a manned spacecraft, it will be the first time in human history, and it will be the first time in 40 years that the moon will be a launch site for a manned spacecraft," he said. "It will be a breakthrough in our space engineering and will set China's manned space programme in motion and make an important contribution to the development of the global space era." It is not clear if this new program will be started on a lunar orbiter, launched by a returned Chang'e-3 spacecraft, or whether an orbiter will be launched by a separate spacecraft. The new program will probably be launched in two or three years and could also involve building a moon base. The Chinese lunar mission will be a lunar rover mission, which will carry science equipment and other gear and it will land on the lunar surface and send back images and data about the moon and its environment to Earth. 1.
