Conventional packet-based communication networks (e.g., the Internet) cannot efficiently interconnect directly embedded systems (i.e., smart objects) with their surrounding environment. An infrastructure for establishing direct communication between embedded systems and their environment is needed to effectively control and monitor the surrounding environment. The Open Embedded Services (OES) standard (defines a set of open source hardware and software interfaces for enabling the real-time control of embedded systems over the Internet. The OES standard addresses the main requirements for enabling embedded systems to be controlled and observed via the Internet. The current OES standard does not address, however, the need to limit any potential hazards associated with automated monitoring of the real-time behavior of embedded systems to the surrounding environment. Further, the current OES standard fails to provide a robust solution to avoid unwanted or malicious actions taken by individuals or organizations when accessing the online monitoring of an embedded system via the Internet. It is in this context that embodiments described in this disclosure arise.
