A prognostic score for predicting the outcome of depression in secondary care: does mood change matter? The impact of depressive relapse on the outcome of depression may be reduced if an effective intervention can be identified prior to relapse. Determining outcome (clinical improvement or worsening) in the months following an index episode requires information on mood change in the intervening period. The objective of this study is to define the time to change in mood and to determine whether early change in mood can predict later relapse and outcome. We conducted a longitudinal study of depressed patients admitted to a specialist depression service in North-West England. A total of 348 patients who presented with current depressive episode were followed up at 3 months and 1 year. Cox proportional hazards models were used to estimate the prognostic value of early change in mood and to model the effects of early mood change on clinical outcome, with relapse as the primary outcome measure. At 3 months, 60% of patients still had an episode of depression. At 12 months, 8% of patients were depressed, 6% had recovered and 6% had relapsed. Patients with late changes in mood were more likely to relapse than those with early mood change (hazard ratio=2.4, 95% confidence interval=1.7-3.4, P[Cytochemical studies on the metabolism of parathormone binding protein in the nucleus of the Sertoli cells of the rat testis]. Cytochemical activities of aminopeptidase M, angiotensin-converting enzyme and dipeptidylpeptidase IV were examined in nucleus of the Sertoli cells of the rat testis. Zinc-chelating chromogen reactivity of the aminopeptidase M activity was observed in the nuclei of the Sertoli cells of the intact and castrated rats. 3e33713323
