Endothelial cell activation is attenuated in an animal model of colitis following cancer chemotherapy. Intestinal inflammation has been shown to result in increased cancer risk. In the current study we investigated whether chemotherapy given to rats to treat a prior colon cancer would alter the development of tumorigenesis and result in altered expression of inflammatory mediators. Rats were given a single dose of azoxymethane to induce colonic tumors followed by treatment with the chemotherapeutic agent 5-fluorouracil (5-FU). Rats were divided into 3 treatment groups, no treatment, 5-FU treatment, and 5-FU + 1-methyl-histamine (1-MHA) treatment. Rats were followed for up to 12 weeks. After euthanasia, tissues were assessed for levels of the inflammatory mediators, TNF-alpha, MCP-1, and nitric oxide, as well as for changes in the nitric oxide pathway in the colon. The single intraperitoneal injection of 5-FU given after a single administration of azoxymethane to tumor-bearing rats resulted in decreased levels of TNF-alpha, MCP-1, and nitric oxide compared to levels found in control animals. These decreased levels of inflammatory mediators persisted in the 5-FU + 1-MHA treated group. Addition of 1-MHA to the chemotherapeutic regimen did not further attenuate these decreases. In the case of the nitric oxide pathway, animals treated with 5-FU showed an increase in eNOS, but not iNOS, levels in the colon. These results suggest that chemotherapy given after a prior cancer reduces the expression of inflammatory mediators, and that this effect may be modulated by the nitric oxide pathway.
