It is well known that, in certain types of vehicles, devices for initiating the ignition of the spark-ignition engine must be situated before the spark plugs which constitute the ignition points, and at a definite position near the spark plugs. In particular, the ignition devices are located at the forward end of the engine, and must be readily accessible to the vehicle driver. Because the ignition devices are often of an electrically controlled design, which may require a power supply for the triggering or initiating operations, the devices are frequently integrated with the spark plugs, and both devices are conventionally situated in the same position. With such an arrangement, only a single ignition device can be used on a vehicle. In practical cases, it is therefore desirable to arrange two ignition devices in the same space, e.g. in a so-
