This study aimed to analyze the mediator role of depression on the relationship between life stress and physical health, and to examine which mediating variables have an effect on this relationship. The data used in this study were collected from the baseline survey of the Korean Welfare Panel Study (KOWEPS) for 2016. The subjects included in this study were 1,412 households who were enrolled in the KOWEPS. The life stress variables included economic hardship, lack of social support, divorce, parental death, work-related problems, and health insurance problems. Depression was measured with the 6-item Center for Epidemiologic Studies Depression (CES-D) scale. Physical health was measured with the 3-item physical health measure (PHM). We analyzed the mediating effects of depression using the "indirect effect" method by calculating the indirect effects of life stress. The mediator effect of depression was present for all life stress variables. In the case of lack of social support and parental death, the mediator effect of depression on the relationship between life stress and physical health was considerably stronger than in the case of economic hardship, work-related problems, and health insurance problems. The mediator effect of depression on the relationship between life stress and physical health can be analyzed based on economic hardship, lack of social support, divorce, parental death, work-related problems, and health insurance problems. In particular, the mediating effect of depression on the relationship between life stress and physical health is stronger when there is a lack of social support and parental death. The Trump administration wants to eliminate a program that helps thousands of Central American immigrants get a temporary work visa. The decision, announced Wednesday, comes as the administration has announced steps to ramp up deportations. The program — known as TPS, for Temporary Protected Status — shields nearly 300,000 immigrants who fled the chaos in their home countries because of violence, natural disasters and other crises. The immigrants cannot return to
