The use of the ice-slurry technique for the in vitro culture of the lungworm Dictyocaulus viviparus in bovine lungs. The in vitro culture of the lungworm Dictyocaulus viviparus was achieved using the ice-slurry technique with modified BDM medium, which resulted in very high worm recoveries in the bovine lungs used in the study. There was no significant difference in the number of worms recovered from in vivo- and in vitro-infected lungs when these were cultured in the modified BDM medium, but significantly fewer worms were recovered from in vivo-infected lungs cultured without the medium. NOD-like receptor signaling is important for early innate immune responses and there are NOD-like receptor signaling-dependent microbial epitopes that are recognized in both MHC class I and class II pathways. The epitopes are useful as vaccines to elicit a protective immune response against infectious diseases. One of the most well characterized NOD-like receptors, NOD1, is a cytosolic receptor that is expressed on the surface of most cells. It senses bacterial peptidoglycans in a caspase-independent manner leading to increased levels of the proinflammatory cytokines, such as TNF, IL-1, and IL-12. NOD1 responds to di- and tri-acylated peptidoglycans derived from Gram-negative and Gram-positive bacteria. It has been reported that in humans NOD1 recognizes Nod1 ligand peptides composed of two to twelve amino acids that are derived from Gram-negative and Gram-positive bacteria by Dr. Qin's group. The Nod1
