Launcher\data_win32\worlds\fc2_main.
Even when working with the file in question, I couldn't find a Dat fileQ: How can I start a process from within a service? I'm running some processes as a service, and it isn't working. I can't seem to find a way to make a program start from within the service. So far I've found the following: ServiceType serviceType = ServiceController.GetService( typeof(ProcessService)) as ServiceType; Type serviceType =

serviceType as Type; var procStart = serviceType.GetMethod("Start"); procStart.Invoke(null, new object[] { });

This does start the process, but it takes over the window. It starts just fine in VisualStudio, but as soon as I go to another window while debugging, it starts and I lose the debugging. Is there a way to avoid this, or do I need to restart the service? Update: This is a Windows service, and the goal is to keep debugging as long as possible. A: The solution was simple, just set the Launch type in the Service configuration to "Disabled" and everything works fine. Regional saturation of gas exchange in the dog heart. The gas exchange capacity of the canine heart was examined in the awake anesthetized, spontaneously breathing dog by measuring the uptake of radioactive carbon dioxide ($Rb-14CO_2$) and radioactive oxygen ($Rb-18O_2$). Regional differences in the gas exchange were examined to relate regional differences in cardiac function to changes in coronary blood flow. The gas exchange of the left ventricle (LV) was compared with that of the left atrium (LA). Results of this comparison indicate that at rest during normal cardiac function, and during exercise in which left atrial pressure and volume increase, the gases can be transported across the LV endocardium in approximately one-third as long as they can across the surface of the LA. As a result
