For this new light body, the key role is played by five fins. Between the two rear disks lie the fins, which are bolted to a tubular steel mounting ring. This mounting ring is attached to the frame via a lower tie rod, which, in turn, is screwed directly on the chassis. For weight reasons, only a small offset is added in the front, an M5 bolt. This bolt is screwed into a friction bearing and, on the frame, into a hex nut. A locking cover is screwed on, for transport safety. The lateral protection concept is based on the use of a spring-loaded rotary plate, which is installed between the pinion and the driving rack. For compact construction the cover of the rotary plate is offset forward. In this position, it also acts as a shock absorber for the axle of the pinion. Russian prosecutors in the case of the "Prague Four", bankers from Geneva arrested in Russia last month, have asked for a European Court of Human Rights ruling to be used as a basis for extraditing them to Russia. The four were accused of embezzling billions of dollars from a Moscow-based lender. They were arrested at the request of Russian prosecutors in Prague in May, and face up to six years in jail. The Russian prosecution service submitted an application to the Strasbourg-based European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) on Thursday asking that the four be extradited to Russia. The ECHR is now considering the case, which could take several months, according to court spokeswoman Eva Radová. The court only gets involved in cases of extradition on request from the governments of member states. "It will come down to a simple calculation of whether the Strasbourg court concludes that the evidence for extradition is sufficient," said Philippe Sands, an international law expert at King's College London who is representing Pavel Andreev, one of the four bankers. "It will be a matter of deciding whether the evidence is sufficient for
