Aspergillus fumigatus, a ubiquitous mould, grows in hospital air at a steady-state concentration of 10(3) to 10(4) colony forming units per cubic metre, and is found in 20-50% of hospital rooms. The risk of infection with this organism is increasing in the setting of hospital acquired pneumonia, multiple organ failure, cancer chemotherapy, invasive instrumentation, and other recent surgical procedures. The few published reports of intestinal perforation and anastomotic dehiscence. We report a case of intestinal perforation from Aspergillus fumigatus infection with anastomotic dehiscence. Search form You are here Findings In the past, the media have reported on cases of domestic violence, but to our knowledge this is the first study to examine the prevalence of domestic violence across all countries and territories. The major theme that emerged from our review of research on domestic violence was how domestic violence manifests itself in different ways in different countries. For example, it is a prevalent problem in one region and a rarer problem in another. In some areas, it is widely accepted that domestic violence is not a significant problem. But in other areas, the situation is reversed. Many people believe domestic violence only happens to women. However, this report highlights research that has demonstrated that men are also victims of domestic violence. Men can be more vulnerable to abuse if they or their female partner has a mental health problem, or if they ar
