“Our new engine and ‘HyperMotion’ technology are leading the way in player animation and dynamic movement,” said Walter de Klerk, senior vice president and general manager of EA SPORTS’ FIFA franchise. “Players are now more expressive, intensely agile and reactive. With the addition of the ‘HyperMotion’ engine, game development and our creative teams will have the creative freedom to craft even greater experiences and personalize the football experience for gamers worldwide.”

Added in-game commentator Ian Darke, “The ‘HyperMotion’ engine has challenged me for the first time. I can’t wait to find out what else it can do. My first experience with it has left me speechless.”

The “HyperMotion” engine offers many enhancements to current FIFA technologies. It adds in-game animation capture and replays, and captures the run, sprint, dribble and pass animations of the player. For the first time, players can positionally animate their run animations based on their run angle and speed, and can sprint or coast for multiple frames in an animation while staying perfectly in-line. Players are now able to dribble, volleying the ball and gliding on both feet, while maintaining in-line dribbling power and distance. Players will also move with more intensity during headers and will perform greater in-game feints. During a run, players will slide or bounce when they’re close to the ball, and after a pass they will recover their post-pass motion into a shot animation. To help make the movements of the player more natural, and to limit the burden on the player, player performance can be turned down in the player settings. The player animations, 3D models, physics, animations and sounds are all recorded from real-life players during gameplay, enabling players to be digitally upgraded to a higher level. Many of the animations include the ability to skip animation sequences by holding the button while running or passing the ball. Players can sprint or dribble for long periods without animations after sprinting or dribbling. The engine also gives the player more control over how they move. Forward movement can be controlled by changing the player’s sprint direction and launching the ball while moving backward. Players can also accelerate while moving backwards to sprint in the correct direction. Players can even spin backwards for a certain amount of time, giving them a way to change direction
