Molecular control of mammalian embryonic pattern formation. In the mouse embryo, the primary body axis is derived from an embryonic organizer located at the posterior end of the embryo, the primitive streak, and correct body axis formation is thought to depend on the concerted action of genes in the anterior and posterior halves of the embryo. These genes are thought to be expressed in a nested pattern along the body axis in the mouse embryo, being expressed in the posterior half of the embryo and refined in the anterior half. Studies of the axial expression of various homeobox and paired box genes in the mouse embryo have provided insights into possible mechanisms that may mediate pattern formation.Not all cultures are equal: The sociocultural influences of a first language. Language-first or language-dominant learners should be able to buffer sociocultural influences and be more aware of the social and cultural influences on their development. The current study examined whether perceived social and cultural impact (impacted = influence has a large impact, unimpacted = influence has a low impact) predicts a learner's language development in a world-first language acquisition context. Participants included a sample of 309 students in late elementary school to early middle school who were learning English as a first language (n = 204) or second language (n = 115). Participants completed measures of their social and cultural learning environment and perspectives on language learning. Results revealed that perceived cultural impact positively correlated with language proficiency. Although first-language learners had lower perceived cultural impact than second-language learners, their performance was similar. Thus, neither first-language nor second-language learners had negative social and cultural outcomes. These findings suggest that high-performing first-language learners are at a disadvantage in the social and cultural environment, regardless of the learner's second language.NHS Trusts and regulators are pushing to have their legal responsibilities split from those of the NHS Commissioning Board, the body that manages and funds commissioning, amid concerns over "regulatory complacency", according to leaked documents.
