The group of hackers calling themselves The Shadow Brokers used the so-called 0day vulnerability in Microsoft Office to crack the CIA's data network. Now the hackers are releasing that data on an encrypted Dropbox. It was announced earlier today that The Shadow Brokers published a batch of NSA hacking tools online, as the group claimed it has obtained access to the NSA's database. The hackers then published a list of cyber weapons the group intends to sell to the highest bidder and resume their hacking campaigns. The release came exactly one month after the group hacked the NSA's data infrastructure, where they appeared to have gained access to the agency's network sometime in mid-August. The Shadow Brokers released a report this weekend titled "Past the Wall," which makes a threat that it will release another NSA cyber hacking tool. The group claims that the disclosed documents reveal a major flaw in the NSA's defenses, suggesting that the agency is still struggling to contain further leaks. "Ostensibly the Shadow Brokers operation is designed to destabilize the global surveillance industry. We, on the other hand, plan to exploit the NSA's own internal tradecraft to maximize the intelligence value for others," reads the report. "In particular, we will soon release NSA exploits targeting Siemens controllers, currently used in US critical infrastructure." The Shadow Brokers' report claims that the hackers stole four critical zero-day vulnerabilities in Microsoft Office
