Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a method and apparatus for measuring the characteristics of a tire which is one of the components of a vehicle. More particularly, the invention relates to a method and apparatus for measuring the characteristics of a tire which can be utilized in a tire test vehicle (TTV) based on the principle of camber-center separation developed by the present inventors. 2. Description of the Related Art In general, a vehicle is required to have satisfactory performance in a variety of aspects. Because tires play a very important role in the performance of a vehicle, tire manufacturers pay much attention to the characteristics of tires. An adequate tire size is desirable for a vehicle to have good road holding properties in a variety of driving conditions including dry, wet, and snow driving conditions. In addition, the optimum tire pressure may be required for a vehicle to have good handling performance. Moreover, it is desirable for a vehicle to be provided with tires having good durability for the running thereof for a prolonged period of time. In order to satisfy the above-described requirements, it is necessary to measure the characteristics of a tire. For this purpose, various tire measuring devices have been developed in the art.

One of the most advanced tire measuring devices of the related art is disclosed in laid-open Japanese patent publication No. 2-234748. In the tire measuring device disclosed in the publication, a wedge shaped member is inserted in a tire, and the tire is rotated while a tire rotation angle is continuously measured. Then, the tire is removed from the tire measuring device, and a state of wear of the tire is determined based on a tire rotation angle and the wedge angle. Another tire measuring device of the related art is disclosed in laid-open Japanese patent publication No. 3-

Because of the lack of knowledge about transgendered patients and gender dysmorphic patients, the literature is full of tragic stories about the wrong treatments. Here, we report on a procedure to induce a chemical castration to reduce the risk of gonadectomy in transsexual patients. We report four cases in which a small dose of Finasteride (1 mg/day during 8 weeks) was administered by mouth to inhibit the formation of oestrogens and testosterone. We observed that the treatment prevented pubertal development in all four cases, but the hormonal level in some cases remained high enough to promote vaginal penetration, which allowed the initiation of a feminizing hormonal treatment. This first treatment with Finasteride has shown to be safe and showed to modify the harmful hormonal ratio of the patients. Because of its low cost, it could be used at every hospital, where hormonal treatments are available, or even in specialized centres. There is therefore a major need to practice this procedure to protect transsexuals who require hormonal treatments. This technique requires an expertise in surgery of the genital organs and their vasculature, a good knowledge of the hormonal status of the patients, and a good knowledge of the treatment of transsexual patients.
