When you're taught how to use a tool, you tend to use it like the tool is designed. If you've never used the layering system in Photoshop before, learn how to use it. You can download programs that will help you do that at www.tutorialmate.com/tutorials/photoshop and at www.learningphotoshop.com; they have detailed online and DVD tutorials. If you want to apply a clip-art image to a photograph, or you want to take a background and make it transparent, or you want to create a vignette effect around your subject, consider using Photoshop's Actions. They don't have to be complex, and you can create your own by visiting www.tutorialmate.com and searching for the action you want to make. You can create or purchase actions from places like Adobe Stock (www.adobe.com/stock) and Artstorm (www.artstorm.com). In fact, you can even create your own by using Photoshop's Layers panel and masking. The main point to remember is that Photoshop's Actions can be another tool in your toolbox. Figures 9-2 and 9-3 show two types of use: adding a vignette and making the background disappear so that the image appears to be printed on a dark piece of paper. Photoshop Elements is a full-featured photo editing and retouching tool that works with both DNG and RAW image formats. (See Figure 9-4.) Figure 9-2: Using the pen tool, create a narrow border around a photo. Figure 9-3: Create a vignette effect using the Burn tool. Figure 9-4: Enhance the color in your images using the Hue/Saturation tool. Figure 9-5 shows an example of the Multiple Layers dialog box that appears when you create a new layer. The Layers palette on the left displays the layers currently open in Photoshop. In this example, there are two layers. Figure 9-5: Using the Layers palette, select a layer and click Add Layer to create a new layer. Open an image in Photoshop and then select the Photoshop Layers dialog box from the Window menu, as shown in Figure 9-6. This dialog box is used for creating new layers and works with the Layers

A systematic review of the efficacy and safety of polyethylene glycol electrolyte powder combined with polyethylene glycol in the treatment of chronic constipation: A protocol for systematic review. Chronic constipation (CC) is a common digestive disease. Currently, it has become a serious public health issue. Polyethylene glycol (PEG) electrolyte powder combined with PEG (PEG + E) is a non-invasive alternative for the treatment of CC. However, its efficacy and safety are still uncertain. To assess the efficacy and safety of PEG + E in the treatment of CC. We will apply electronic databases including PubMed, the Cochrane Library, the Chinese National Knowledge Infrastructure, the Chinese Biomedical Database, the Wangfang Data, the Chinese Scientific Journal Database, the Chinese Clinical Trial Register, the Chinese Medical Association, and the platform of ClinicalTrials.gov to perform a systematic review. Randomized controlled trials (RCTs) comparing PEG + E with placebo or no intervention for the treatment of CC were included. Two reviewers will independently assess the methodological quality of all included studies and extract data from eligible studies. The primary outcome was the rate of improving constipation. The secondary outcomes included symptom scores, patient quality of life, adverse events, colon transit time (CTT), colonic transit time (CTT), and fecal volume. Revman 5.3 software will be used to perform meta-analysis to assess the efficacy of PEG + E in improving constipation and safety. This protocol is registered in PROSPERO, and the registration number is CRD42018065135. The PRISMA-P statement will be used for the reporting of this systematic review. PROSPERO, CRD42018065135. have been lying under the hills. When she finally gets to America, she is in a wheelchair. Field of the Invention This invention relates to analog and digital signal processing, and more particularly, to processing of signals having a time varying parameter. 2. Description of Related Art Modern telecommunications services provide users with increased flexibility with regard to time, place, and rate of telephone calls. For example, conventional telephone systems typically provide voice mail services to both residential and business users which enable users to record, store, and retrieve messages for incoming and outgoing calls. Such messages are stored on a call-by-call basis when the call is either received or received after a predetermined period of time. However, in the case of call return messages, i.e., messages for incoming calls, these messages are not stored and returned to the caller, but rather, the called party receives the voice mail message. Also, rather than being able to selectively choose the times when a particular telephone line is answered, the caller is subject to the telephone answering system's answer message regardless of the caller's availability. Voice mail services have become so useful that users are now able to receive voice mail messages over the Internet. One such example of Internet based voice mail systems is the Global Speech-to-Text Service provided by AT&T and Lucent Technologies of Murray Hill, N.J., USA. With this system, all users who are logged on and using the Internet are able to send and receive text messages via their home or office telephone lines without having to access any voice mail services. Similarly, when a user's home or office telephone line is not connected to the Internet, the user has no way of receiving mail via an Internet voice mail system. Thus, such Internet based
