Cardiac assistance devices are well known for assisting the flow of blood in the circulation of a patient suffering from cardiac failure. A particular example of a well known cardiac assistance device is a total artificial heart, which, when implanted in a patient and connected to the patient's natural heart, will pump blood against the patient's natural heart. For example, a cardiac assist device may be implanted for the purpose of removing oxygen from the blood of the patient in the event that the patient requires artificial respiration. As a result of improved medical care, cardiac failure patients are now living longer than ever before.

For the cardiac assistance devices to work as intended, the patient's condition must not be adversely affected. A patient's condition should not be affected by the level of medication he or she receives, the types of medication the patient receives, or any other effect of surgery or other therapy. To prevent a patient's condition from being adversely affected by the level of medication the patient receives, a pacemaker or cardiac assist device may include a counter that counts the number of times that the patient receives certain types of medications. For example, a cardiac assist device may include a counter that keeps track of the number of times a patient receives antiarrhythmic medications. An alarm may
